

Pages from a Private Diary (Classic Reprint)

Henry Charles Beeching

Excerpt from Pages From a Private Diary Write. He is secretly regarded by his neighbours - even though they subscribe to Mudie as the world in general regards the common in former or the professional interviewer. I recall at this moment with a shiver the lowered temperature of the house in which I happened to be staying, when some one newly returned from town communicated to one and another the fact of my indiscretion. People began to speak to me as if they were on oath, and as if every word might be used against them. I sat late that evening with an old gentleman, who was telling stories to which I had often listened with pleasure, and we said good-night outside my bedroom door. In a minute I heard him tip toeing back along the corridor. Of course, he said, you understand that what I have told you to-night is strictly between ourselves.
